PRILABELPHIA, September 8.

The slavery debate was continued this evening.
A number of Southern students were present. Brownlow wished it understood he was not demolished by Frynne's rejoinder, but he would soon crack the latter a armor, by holding up the scriptures. It was not expected that the upening debate should treat upon the whole rutiget, but Irynne would bear enough before the debate closed. He made copious extracts from the Bible, recognizing the relations between master and lister. He was in favor of treating, working, and whipping slaves well. His quotations from Revelations recognizing the appearance of freemen and bondmen at last created great applause. He contended and endeavored to prove that the relations of alwery was a divine manifestation for Christisnizing the negro race; that alwery dould only work this improvement, and that therefore it is a perpetuation of the divine will and necessary to bumanity. Alluding to Prynne's remorks, that until slavery la sholished, the Union will rock, and Southerners be obliged to sleep with pistols under their pillows, he replied that Southerners only more dear their pillows than spikes and gimlets; but if there ever was an invasion of the South, and his opponent was one of the invadery, be (Brownlind More) and the pillows than spikes and gimlets; but if there ever was an invasion of the South, and his opponent was one of the invadery, be (Brownlind More) and the pillows than spikes and gimlets; but if there ever was an invasion of the South, and his opponent was one of the invadery, be (Brownlind More) and the pillows than spikes and gimlets; but if there ever was an invasion of the South, and his opponent was one of the invadery, be (Brownlind More) and the pillows than spikes and gimlets; but if there ever was an invasion of the South, and his opponent was one of the invadery, be (Brownlind More) and the pillows than spikes and gimlets; but if there ever was an invasion of the South, and his opponent was one of the invadery, be (Brownlind More) and the t
